Just a Few Things About Cadillac On Its Birthday

Cadillac is named after a Frenchman. Antoine de la Mothe Cadillac, a French army officer, founded a town called Ville d'Étroit—known today as Detroit, Michigan. Apparently they thought, 'Why not him?'

Cadillac founder Henry M. Leland apprenticed under gunmaker Samuel Colt. Leland worked in the legendary gunsmith's revolver factory, learning the value of precision engineering—like using tools that could measure designs within a 1/100,000 of an inch—that he'd eventually take to Caddy.

Cadillac's slogan, "The Standard of the World," was a reference to its engineering. Leland had such high standards when it came to precision that he brought in special tools from Sweden to ensure he had the most precise factory on Earth. To prove this, his engineers disassembled three cars in front of a group of judges, who then shuffled all the parts. Three days later, all three cars fired up perfectly, and went on a 500-mile trip. Cadillac was awarded the Dewar Trophy (yes, that Dewar) for proving the interchangeability of its cars.

By 1910, Cadillac was the first manufacturer to mass-produce cars with enclosed cabins. The enclosed cabins eventually led to the counterbalanced crankshaft to keep the cars quiet. Translation: ride in a Caddy and stay dry from the rain. Noise and vibrations are all magnified when the cabin is closed. By the early 1920s, most Cadillacs were this way. To assuage the harshness, the company balanced the V8 to give it a smoother and more luxurious ride.

In 1912 Cadillac made people less cranky by inventing the electric starter and that electric starter saved lives. The term "cranky" originally referred to the bad mood drivers would be in after struggling to turn the crank while starting their car. Cadillac fixed this by introducing the first electric starter on the Model 30. Leland's engineers began working on the starter after one of his buddies—Byron T. Carter, founder of the Cartercar—died while starting a stranded friend's Caddy. After the car backfired, its crank spun violently and hit him on the head; he died a few weeks later. Leland reportedly said upon his death: "I won't have Cadillacs hurting people that way."

Cadillac became the first American carmaker to hire an automotive stylist. In 1927 Harley Earl designed the LaSalle, and he went on to become an outright legend. He built the first all-steel, one-piece roof that would later lead to what was known as the Turret Top.

After WWII, Caddy introduced the curved glass windshield to America. It was one of the key defining features of 1950s automotive design.

Those iconic fins on the 1959 Eldorado were a result of corporate trickery. Harley Earl was overseeing the design of the car and he wanted the up-and-coming designer Bill Mitchell to lower the rear fins by four inches. When Earl went on vacation, Mitchell, who liked the fins as they were, simply raised one by four inches. The trick worked and Mitchell's fins stuck, becoming a high-point of 1950s style.

It was the first automaker to roll out airbags. That's not a Dagmar pun. It really was the first to start saving lives with the airbag. The airbag comes, as you well know, standard in every car in the world today.
